On 15th of November 2014, Saturday, the students of class XII of Humanities Department visited Machchrauli village situated in Jhajjar district of Haryana, to conduct a survey on Land use pattern as a part of their Geography Practical.

The main two techniques adopted there were Interviewing and Observation. While doing the Survey, the Students interviewed the Sarpanch of the Village to gather information about the overall land use pattern of the village.

The students also interacted with the other members of the village, to know about their standard of living, life style, Socio Economic infrastructure etc. In the process they also came to know about the facilities extended by the government and the problems encountered by the people of the village in their day to day life.

It was a great experience where the students were actively involved as they visited different farms to see how the farmers grew the crops and about the techniques and machineries used by them.
